

5787 THE YEAR KEDUSHA COMES HOME

Finally, one address that helps you every step of the way.

Sunday night in Flatbush, a mother sits at her kitchen table with a list. Her daughter's bas mitzvah is in two months, and she has been asking to upgrade her phone. The question can no longer be pushed off. Which phone? With which filter? At what age, and with what rules? Her husband heard of a few options but is not sure which is best, and the school sent home a letter that answered none of it. She is a capable woman who has organized simchos, budgets and car-pools. Tonight she has a simple, universal question, and no idea where the answer lives.

She is not in crisis. She is every one of us.

Questions like hers reach Guard-Your-Eyes every day, from every kind of family. A rebbi in Flatbush: "I need help with a talmid." A mother in Yerushalayim: "We can't afford a filter." A father in Monsey: "Is there a kosher way for my kids to use AI for school?" A mother in Boro Park: "There are so many kosher phones. Which one is most recommended?" Another father: "When and how should I speak to my boys about Kedusha?" A bochur, alone, at two in the morning: "I gave my word to my Rav and broke it again."

Some of these questions are painful. Most are simply practical. The work laptop the children borrow, which cannot be locked down without blocking the sites you need for parnassa. Parental controls that are switched on, and a twelve-year-old who found a way around them. A Motzaei Shabbos with bored children and nothing kosher to put on for them. The father with a kosher smartphone who reaches for it every free minute and realizes he is not fully present for his own children.

These are no longer questions for "people who struggle." They are questions for anyone with children, a job and a device, which is to say, everyone. And until now, every family answered them the same way: alone, quickly, and hoping for the best.

Every Answer Exists. Nobody Could Find It.

Here is the strange part. Klal Yisroel is blessed with remarkable resources for every one of these questions. Filters, kosher phones, curriculums, chizuk programs, therapists, hotlines. Nothing is missing except a way to find them, and to know which one fits your situation.

Centuries ago, a Yid with a practical question in halacha faced something similar. The answers existed, scattered across Bavli, Yerushalmi and the Rishonim, until Rav Yosef Karo organized the practical halacha into the Shulchan Aruch. Lehavdil, that is what has been missing in this generation's greatest challenge: one address where any Yid can bring any question about technology and Kedusha, and walk away with a clear answer for his own home.

At GYE, we stopped asking what else we should build. The question became: why does that address not exist? This year, 5787, it does, and it answers in three ways. The Kedusha Guide, a full-color printed guide. The 866-KEDUSHA hotline, for instant answers by phone. And Kedusha.com, where you can explore the full library or simply have a conversation with its AI-powered assistant. Free, anonymous, any hour of the day or night.

What's Inside, and How to Just Ask

The Kedusha Guide runs close to 100 full-color pages:

Harav Simcha Bunim

Cohen, Rav of Kahal

Ateres Yeshaya in

Lakewood: "AI is a new tool of the Yetzer Hara, and Project Kedusha is teaching us how to use it for good."

nearly 200 vetted resources from dozens of organizations, in six sections.

1. Education runs by age, from a book for a four-year-old to pre-marriage material, with curriculums and educational material for parents and mechanchim.

2. Chizuk offers videos, WhatsApp groups, seforim and shul-wide programs to help people build their motivation and stay strong.

3. Struggles offers GYE's full range of tools, including mentoring, spousal support and frum therapy referrals for those struggling.

4. Kedusha Safeguards, the largest section, compares every filter in America and Eretz Yisroel side by side, along with popular kosher phones by region and community standard, routers, accountability software, the new kosher AI tools, all the world-wide TAG offices, and Project STEP for anyone who needs help setting up a filter or covering its cost. It even covers the devices people forget: the Xbox, the Tesla.

5. Screen Addiction is the section nobody expects, because it is not about content at all: community initiatives, apps that help people cut down, and lock boxes and timers that put healthy distance between a person and his screen.

6. Kosher Aisle gives bored children safe alternatives, from kosher music and entertainment to phone hotlines and protected media devices.

Wherever you see the GYE badge, it's ours. Everything else is the work of others, and that is the point. This is all of Klal Yisroel's solutions under one roof. Rav Yosef Elefant of the Mir called the Guide a "game changer," and the goal is to get a copy into every home. Because when this book sits openly on a table, it normalizes the conversation. No searching. No shame.

Changing Constantly

A printed book is fixed the day it leaves the press, yet the solutions keep changing. Filters update, phone models come and go, new tools appear every month. So the same library lives at Kedusha.com and on the hotline, where technology experts keep every solution current. When a new filter launches or a new resource comes out, Kedusha.com already knows.

And the website and hotline do something no book has ever done. Ask, and they answer. Remember our mother at the kitchen table? She types one sentence: "My daughter wants to upgrade her phone for her bas mitzvah." What comes back is not a page of search results. Kedusha.com's AI assistant responds the way a wise mentor would. It asks her daughter's age and the family's community standards. It narrows two hundred resources down to the three that fit this home, and even suggests how the conversation with her daughter should sound. The mother in Yerushalayim is offered Israeli filters, not American ones. The father with the work laptop gets a different answer than the father with a smartphone. Anonymously, instantly, and without judgment. Every conversation is reviewed by our team, so the site keeps learning and shapes the next edition of the Guide.

Nineteen Years to Get Here

Project Kedusha did not appear out of nowhere. Guard Your Eyes, founded nineteen years ago by Yaakov Nadel and Yechezkel Stelzer with the guidance of Rabbi Dr. Abraham Twerski zt"l and, yibadel lechaim, Rav Aharon Feldman shlita, has helped tens of thousands break free. Every number stands for marriages rebuilt and fathers present again. Alongside that came a long record of prevention: filters and accountability software, Project STEP, which sponsors a filter when cost is the obstacle, the 30-day Kedusha Challenge running in more than forty shuls this past year, and Esa Einai for thousands of teens during Shovavim.

Still, for years GYE was identified mainly with crisis, and crisis is hard to speak about. Many people never reach out at all because of stigma. Project Kedusha changes that, because the Guide belongs in every home. Not because something is wrong in the house, but because every family is navigating technology.

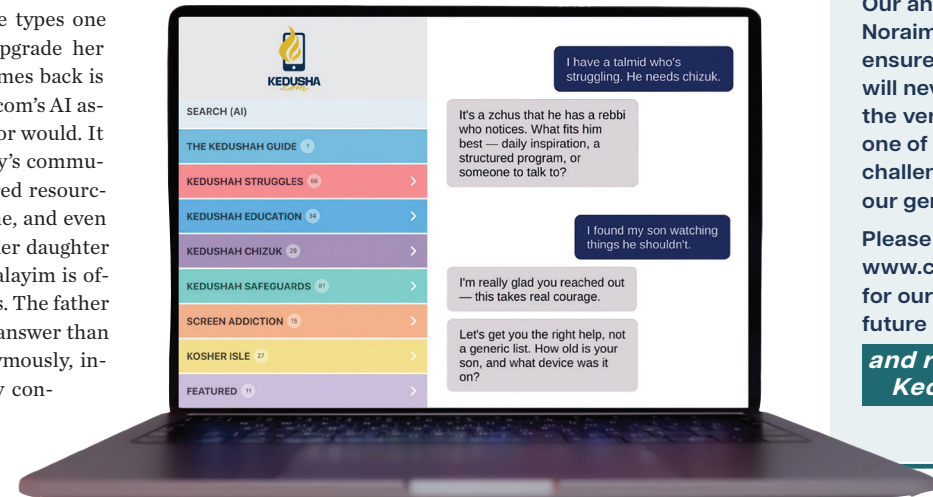

Elul is the season of kabbalos, but our kabbalos rarely survive Cheshvan. Here is one that will. Pick one thing in your house: a conversation you keep putting off, a device with no real filter, a new chizuk program. Project Kedusha will guide you exactly how to go about it.

Somewhere tonight, that mother is back at her kitchen table. This time she is reading an answer written for her daughter, her community, her home. That is the news of this new year: for the first time, every family has a place to ask.

Where to Turn

Everything lives at one address, in whichever form suits your home. IN PRINT: order the Kedusha Guide at kedusha.com/order; shuls, schools and organizations can request copies in quantity at kedusha.com/schools. BY PHONE: call 866-KEDUSHA for instant answers, no internet needed. ONLINE: visit Kedusha.com to explore everything in the Guide, kept constantly current, or ask the AI assistant directly.

None of this exists on its own. It is your partnership that allows GYE to keep expanding and innovating with GuardYourEyes.com, Project Kedusha, Esa Einai, the Kedusha Challenge, Project STEP and more.
